

is what it has to be ...

'A No vote will fill Scots with self-loathing as the rest of the world laughs at the faint hearts of a once-proud people'

That line above is a thought that will haunt many a 'No' voter at the most critical moment when it matters most, and it will hit home at that crucial key moment, when they are standing in the booth with a piece of paper in front of them, a pen in one hand, and one single question.

"Should Scotland be an independent country?"

...and as they read that question, it is at that moment, that realisation at what they are about to do, is now here. they can no longer delay it. They can no longer discuss it. The moment is now here, and for many a 'No' voter, it might not just leave them feeling slightly ill, but it will leave them in complete turmoil also.

The reason being is simple. For the rest of their days, they will know that when Scotland needed that person most, they turned their back on her. They turned their back on their beloved Scotland.

In the future, how can they sing 'Flower of Scotland', or say 'I am a proud Scot' when they know deep-down, they voted 'No'. There will be NO justification for it. No answer they can give will truly suffice. They said 'No'. What a mockery it would for that person who voted 'No' to sing that one key line in the 3rd verse of 'Flower of Scotland', when they have to sing 'but we can still rise now, and be the nation again.' Well ...no we won't, because YOU voted 'No'!

I can tell you right now, for me, a 'No' voter should seriously have a word with themselves when they come up with answers such as 'we can't afford it', 'we'll be worse off' or 'I'm British'. Those are not answers that deserve a 'No' vote.

Simply put, this is about your country, and the question is very simple in my book; are you Scottish or Not? Retorting answers of 'Will I be £500 better off' is not what this question is about'. For the Better Together campaign to shout this out, seriously have no argument or credibility.

At the end of the day, this is about whether you truly love this land, its people, and its way of life. It is as simple as that. That is what we are really voting for. To vote 'No' means you are turning your back on all of that. With a 'No' vote, our Scottish Parliament will diminish, and so will our way of life. A more complex, alienating, right-wing, elite system will arise, heralding-in severe austerity measures, which will be led by the banking system that failed us all. That is what truly awaits Scotland in the event of a 'No' vote.

Which is why, in that key crucial moment, many a 'No' voter ... maybe not all of them, but enough of them ... will think about the future, and will thus, ponder, before placing an 'X' in the 'Yes' box.

To me, the key battle ground on the 18th of September will be the very moment when one stares at that question.

That is when we will win...

@JLT (on Wings over Scotland)

Find out more and join the debate at:

<http://wingsoverscotland.com>

<http://newsnetscotland.com>

<http://www.businessforscotland.co.uk>

<http://derekbateman1.wordpress.com>

<http://bellacaledonia.org.uk>

<https://www.facebook.com/labourforindependence>

<http://reidfoundation.org/>